“ How do I begin to write over something I have always made myself blind to? Every day since I can remember I have woken up with a fire in my soul to be the person that makes a difference. I have always walked through the valleys, over the mountains, into the tunnels filled with darkness because I know at the end their is light. This "something" I speak of is not just the passing of my hero, my daddy, my unconditional best friend, but the something I have now blindly passed is my shining light.

That is what my dad, Ramon Sabater has been to me, always. I have known daddy as a strong, brilliant, resilient man. The man that would humble those near by his sole presence, the man that would put me out of harms way- even when we were on an airplane, one of my biggest phobias, I believed my dad could even stop a plane from falling. How could I not? He could fix anything no matter what it was, he solved the most complicated calculations in life. Today, he has even solved one of the biggest mysteries of them all, how to come back to life when you're not ready to say goodbye. And he did not only do this once but he also did it 21 years ago when I was only a baby girl, and he learned how to talk, walk, and eat all over again at the same time I did for the first time. Thank you mommy for being the toughest woman in the world. At the end of his lessons he only came back stronger.

Little did I know when we were hunting for earth worms to go fishing with my Barbie doll, when we would go glow in the dark putt, play checkers, dominos, when he'd take me to adoption Sundays at petsmart, horseback riding an hour away, puppy stores when the adoptions closed, our ice creams dates at twistee treat, and everlasting stories of me going to get bananas in my Jeep at the grocery store before I'd lay sound asleep in his arms.

Little did I know this man was the purest soul of them all, and you can only find someone like him once in a life time. Little did I know how spoiled I was to call this man my dad. Little have I known that only now I realize you planted this fierce immortal fire in me that I will forever fuel. Even if I have said goodbye and passed my light you have planted it inside me for eternity. I will never be able to repay you, but I'll try until my day has come to never let you forget the man you were. I love you Daddy.

Stephanie, your light will keep on shining. Now even brighter than ever for now you have that special flick. Your daddy was a special man with a kind heart. He will always be by your side and he will forever live deep in your heart. Keep your faith in God and stay as humble and as sweet as he raised you. Remember him with a smile for he is watching over you. As you and your family now feel the void. Heaven is rejoicing for they have a new angel who will forever reside in the celestial mansion.....

Your an amazing young lady and may God continue blessing you each and every day of your life...
